THE DERRICK VAN VEGHTEN HOUSE

HEADQUARTERS OF THE SOMERSET COUNTY HISTORICAL SOCIETY

Overlooking the broad meadowlands stretching along the Raritan River in Bridgewater Township, Somerset County, the Van Veghten House occupies a site that was part of a vast tract of land originally purchased from Native Americans in the early 1680s by the East Jersey Proprietors. Known as the "The Second Indian Tract," the parcel was acquired by Captain John Palmer, Esquire, of Staten Island, in 1683. He in turn conveyed the property to Thomas Codrington. In 1694 Codrington and his wife, Margaret, sold the 836 acres of their holdings, "All that big tract of Land or plantation ... upon the North side of the Raritan River In the Countie of Sumersett (sic)" which were bounded to the west by land of John White and on the east by other property of the grantor, to yeoman Michael Dereckson Van Veghten for £300.5.20.

THE VAN LIEW-SUYDAM HOUSE

By Chris Retz, President, The Meadows Foundation;

This property was initially part of the Frederick Van Liew tract, acquired in 1701 as part of a land deal between former Dutch colonial residents of Flatbush, LI, and NJ speculators John Harrison and John Willcocks. In 1811 the 71-acre farmstead was sold to Joseph Suydam, who was himself a Dutchman from Brooklyn, born there in 1772. The present house was constructed by his son Peter in 1875.

Suydam and his heirs farmed the property until the 1920s, when it changed hands twice before being sold to John R. French. He continued to work the land until a storm destroyed several of the original farm buildings in 1950. The final owners of the house, Robert and Dorothy O'Connell, bought the property in 1961, converted the house to a modern residence, and demolished several more of the outbuildings. Nonetheless, the agricultural land around the residence continued in cultivation prior to state acquisition as part of the Six Mile Run Reservoir Project in 1973. The Meadows Foundation began leasing the structures and the land from Franklin Township in October 1988.

The architectural form and development of the house have been somewhat obscured by both recent renovation work and the building campaign of Peter Suydam in the mid-1870s. The overall form of the building places it firmly in the tradition of Italianate farmhouses common throughout the United States during the latter part of the 19th century. Following a pattern employed often by thrifty New Jersey farmers, Suydam reused pieces of an earlier house or houses in the construction of his large 1875 dwelling. He also built on the site of an earlier dwelling that now forms the better part of the dining room wing. How much of the fabric of this earlier wing is intact is not clear. While the foundation and framing of the dining room wing were examined for conclusive evidence of date of construction, the architect and his team were frustrated by a lack of consistent physical evidence that could be corroborated in the property history. The original structure was probably a story-and-a-half, braced farm building with a small lean-to constructed on the north side. The original roof also reused old timbers. The 1875 farmhouse was only minimally altered during the 20th century when the north kitchen lean-to was rebuilt and a southern room added to serve as an auxiliary kitchen.

Only one of the outbuildings, which numbered as many as twelve in the early 20th century, exists today. This structure, called the granary, was used by the last occupants of the farm as a retail facility for sales of produce and farm goods.

Today, the house is handicapped accessible via an ADA standard ramp on the south side. The interior boasts formal, north-facing front rooms, while the everyday family rooms face the sunny rear of the house. All of these are characteristic of 19th-century vernacular architecture.

Michael Van Veghten (1663-1737) was a descendent of early Dutch immigrants. His grandfather, Teunis Dirckse Van Veghten, had immigrated from Veghten (near Utrecht), Holland in 1638. By the early 1700s, Michael Van Veghten had become a well-established resident of Somerset County with extensive land holdings. From his ample plantation, he donated land for the First Dutch Church of Raritan, which was built in 1721.

Though it is not known precisely when he built his house on the banks of the Raritan River, it was probably during the very late 17th century or early 18th century. A deed from 1722 includes a survey map depicting "Micheels van veghteens house" in the vicinity of the present structure.

Michael Van Veghten married twice, and with his first wife, Marytje Parker, had four children, two of whom survived to adulthood. His marriage to second wife, Jannetje De Mont, produced three children: Jannetje, Derrick, and Jantien. Upon his death in 1737, his significant real estate holdings in Somerset County passed to his daughter Jannetje and son Derrick (1699-1781). Jannetje inherited "All that Plantation and Tract of Land on the South Side of the Raritan River...bought of Philip Headman," and Derrick inherited the family plantation, at least 1000 acres, to the north of the Raritan River, including the "Plantation in which my said wife and I now live..." (see next page)

Derrick Van Veghten (1699-1781) apparently inherited his father's fine reputation, as well as his land. He was chosen as a Somerset County representative to the New Jersey Assembly in 1743 and 1744 and served as commissioner of highways. Sometime during the first half of the 18th century he donated land for the bridge that crossed the Raritan River to the southeast of the Van Veghten house. The bridge was known as the "Van Veghten Bridge" or alternately, the "Long Bridge." The bridge was at the approximate site of the modern bridge crossing the Raritan River on Finderne Avenue.

The American Revolution had a great impact on Derrick Van Veghten. In 1770, he acted as "chairman of a group of merchants that renewed an agreement to resist the Stamp Act." The proximity of his residence to the Old York Road, one of the main routes across the state, and to the Van Veghten Bridge, an important Raritan River crossing point, ensured his involvement in the events of the war.

On December 6, 1776, when the British army was pursuing Washington's army south through New Jersey, Captain Johann Ewald, a Hessian officer of the Field Jager Corps, visited the Van Veghten plantation. Troops under Lord Cornwallis's command had bivouacked near Van Veghten's bridge, when around 9:00 pm Ewald was ordered by Cornwallis to lead a small detachment to the Van Veghten place to "pick up the master of the house, as well as a mounted guide who knew the Morristown area, and bring them back." Ewald left a vivid account in his diary of his raid on the plantation and encounter with the "master of the house," Derrick Van Veghten.

After the battles of Trenton and Princeton, the remnants of Washington's rag-tag army crossed the Van Veghten Bridge and passed by the Van Veghten House on their way to Morristown. During the winter and spring campaigns of 1777, British troops were stationed in New Brunswick, while American units were encamped around Bound Brook and along the First Watchung Mountain. Numerous skirmishes occurred as British soldiers conducted foraging raids and other probes up the Raritan Valley. By late spring, the British decided to withdraw from New Jersey.

During the second Middlebrook encampment, between November 28, 1778, and June 3, 1779, Continental Army troops again occupied Derrick Van Veghten's neighborhood. General Nathaniel Greene, Quarter Master General, used the Van Veghten house as his headquarters, while units of the army camped nearby. Troops from Pennsylvania camped south of the house across the river, and the Artificers were about a mile to the northeast.

Under cover of night on October 25, 1779, British Lieutenant-Colonel John Simcoe led a force of "Queen's Rangers" (American Tories) from Staten Island to Van Veghten's bridge. They were to capture Governor Livingston, mistakenly thought to be staying nearby at Philip Van Horne's house, and destroy large flatboats stored at the bridge. Discovering that Livingston was not at the Van Horne home, the force returned to the bridge and set fire to the flatboats. The soldiers proceeded to the Dutch Meeting and used hand grenades to burn the church. Simcoe rationalized this because he thought the church had sheltered a sniper and served as a supply depot.

Finally, at the end of July 1781, the French Army under General Rochambeau marched past the Van Veghten House and across the bridge en route to Yorktown. Derrick was 82 years old at the time, but he would have witnessed the march. He died a few months later and was interred in the burying grounds at the site of the First Dutch Church of Raritan.

During Michael's lifetime, the tract of land with the house was sold and then repurchased, but at the end of his life, in 1831, he was living in the house. Michael's son Richard Van Veghten inherited the house and lived there until 1843. By that time, the size of the farm had dwindled to 125 acres. During the subsequent four decades, the house and farm passed through a number of owners, until it was purchased by Bernhard Meyer in 1897. Meyer was an emigrant and farmer from Oldenburg Germany. During the years he lived in the house, Meyer acquired a total of 500 acres and formed a breeding company specializing in Holstein cattle. His heirs eventually sold the land to the Singer Manufacturing Company, but Bernhard Meyer, Jr. leased the house and continued to live there until 1970. In 1973, the house was deeded to the Somerset County Historical Society.

Today, the Van Veghten House is the headquarters of the Somerset County Historical Society and houses a research library and small museum. While it still overlooks the broad meadowlands stretching along the Raritan River as it did 300 years ago, the house is now surrounded on the north and east by modern industrial buildings. The structure has recently undergone extensive renovation thanks to grants from Somerset County and should continue to server the historical community for many years to come.
